From 1934–1945, the Rundbriefe was a top secret newsletter that circulated among a small group of socially and politically committed refugee psychoanalysts. Otto Fenichel, its founder and one of Freud’s most eminent followers, urged this small group of analysts not to isolate themselves. He wrote in the Rundbriefe, “Where there is still truth, it will be preserved, even if it must fling far… the fate of psychoanalysis depends on the fate of the world.”

The world survived but the fate of psychoanalysis took a turn Fenichel couldn’t have predicted. The power of psychoanalysis to address man’s conflicted, rapacious desires and the dehumanizing impact of civilization degraded over the decades. Many of the revolutionary aspects of psychoanalysis that were not aligned with the economic or political aims of new host cultures were repressed or marginalized.

For the past sixty years, the Institute for Psychoanalytic Training and Research (IPTAR) promoted a radical classical analytic position often at odds with the internal and external pressures facing psychoanalysis. When psychoanalysis in America was monopolized by the medical profession, IPTAR provided rigorous training to social workers and psychologists. As more mental health practitioners gained access to training, IPTAR opened its doors to individuals from non-mental health backgrounds.
and to foreigners without access to analytic training in their native countries. When available community mental health services dwindled, IPTAR’s clinical center provided thousands of New Yorkers access to low fee psychoanalytic treatment. The Clinical Center has also provided individual and group treatment in six schools over the past fifteen years and has partnered with other agencies to provide free treatment to refugees and asylum seekers.

But what does all this have to do with IPTAR’s newsletter ROOM: a sketchbook for analytic action?

As it turns out, everything. At root, psychoanalysis holds that making room for the unconscious is critical to the understanding of ourselves and our society. It is one thing to facilitate treatments that make room for the silenced. It is another thing for analysts to plumb our own experiences. Like Fenichel’s Rundbriefe, ROOM is devoted to maintaining a connection to each other and to our analytic roots in the midst of a frightening political reality. Unlike the Rundbriefe, ROOM is not sequestered within a closed analytic circle. Like psychoanalysis, ROOM is open to all.

The first issue of ROOM took us by surprise. Mental health professionals across the United States and from London to Jerusalem responded with enthusiasm. ROOM hit a chord with non-analysts as well. As one novelist told me, “None of us can stop watching the news. We all need help with this. Everyone wants to know what people in the mental health profession are thinking now.”

In this issue of ROOM are Jared Russell’s impassioned response to Elizabeth Cutter Evert’s thought provoking essay (which appeared in ROOM 2.17) on the bridge between psychoanalytic and religious endeavors, C. Jama Adam’s literary and musical reminder that we do not exist in isolation from each other, Richard Grose’s creative take on our sudden addiction to television, and a philosophical essay by Carlos Padron which speaks of psychoanalysis as a radical practice of otherness which has the power address the blindness in our souls. ROOM 5.17 ends with an old toast by Sheldon Bach to a future we have come to inhabit.

Psychoanalytic therapists of all stripes are stepping up to contribute poetry, critical essays, ideological arguments, biographical reflections, – and when words just won’t do, art, photography, and music. Beginning with this issue we have added a permanent section at the end of ROOM called DISPATCHES, which is devoted to announcements and different actions analysts are taking in their communities.

We don’t know where this analytic newsletter will take us next, but we do know we can go further than homeland security asks us to go. If you see something, don’t just say something—submit something to roominiptar@gmail.com. Your contribution will help us all.

We expect our next issue will be coming out in September. Submissions for ROOM 9.17 are welcome through the end of August.
We are now ensnared in an anti-reality TV show with no commercial breaks.
The scripts are written and edited by a gang — malignantly perverse child-people — whose only talent is knowing how to carve away any hint of veracity and compassion from the complexity of the human experience, leaving just the sharp and brittle bones of hostility scattered on the ground for the emotionally malnourished to claw at and collect.
Lamentable weapons of control against the vulnerability of the other that they are not authorized to feel in their very own selves.
Since the election of T\(^1\) as president many people who can see nothing positive in him whatsoever, either as human being or politician, are nevertheless transfixed by him on television and watch him with a fascination and an attention that they cannot account for and do not approve of. I want to put forward here a couple of ideas about that unaccountable fascination and attention.

Train Wreck

The T presidency has been a spectacular train wreck by any normal standard. We have elected as president someone who knows nothing about any issue, domestic or foreign, except how it plays or could play on television. T’s ignorance and contempt for knowledge remain breathtaking. And, as we hardly need to be reminded, when policies based on ignorance and contempt for knowledge are carried out in reality, the result is, at a minimum, disaster. Thus the train wreck that we see now portends more serious train wrecks coming.

The very awfulness of this may be one reason we can’t stop watching. A gruesome spectacle, however repulsive, draws us in whether we like it or not. This is given clear expression in Plato’s Republic in the following story:

> Leontius, the son of Aglaion, was going up from the Piraeus under the outside of the North Wall when he noticed corpses lying by the [place of the] public executioner. He desired to look, but at the same time he was disgusted and made himself turn away, and for a while he struggled and covered his face. But finally, overpowered by the desire, he opened his eyes wide, ran toward the corpses, and said: ‘Look, you damned wretches, take your fill of the fair sight.’” (Book IV, 440 a)

A similar impulse causes us to gawk at accidents and fires. In any case, as Leontius knew, being aware of this attraction to what is hideous and appalling, we usually are conflicted about giving in to that desire. This would be one element of our discomfort at watching T so much.
Narcissisms

That T is a narcissist is well-known. It has been extensively reported that T spends a lot of time watching himself on television. Therefore, in a real sense, when we watch him on TV he is watching along with us. Now, of course, all presidents in the television age have been aware of their self-presentation on television; the difference, alas, is that they also had an idea of something besides their image on television. Thus, in T we are seeing a purified extract of narcissism uncontaminated by any object inputs.

I would argue that such a pure narcissism speaks to our own narcissism in a way that can circumvent our conscious political selves. T became president, clearly, because his narcissism was embraced by millions of Americans whose lives were overfull of narcissistic wounds. For them his narcissism was a healing balm. They identified with it. And their identification with his narcissism remains one of the reasons for fearing the totalitarian tendencies in T and his followers. But perhaps the power of his narcissism also reaches even his bitterest enemies, who find themselves watching him in disgust not only with him but with themselves for watching him. Perhaps his narcissism is so powerful and so well-developed that it reaches to some degree everyone who bears narcissistic wounds, which is, of course, everybody.

If this is true, then T’s very emptiness would be a source of a hidden attractiveness (not yet, thankfully, reflected in his poll numbers).

Civic Duty

Of course, our watching a president who has populated the government with train wreck artists is also driven by our outrage as citizens who would prefer responsible, rational government. Unfortunately, the conflicted viewers of T may find it hard to consider their viewing as exercising a civic duty. But it clearly is.

To help us see this point, let us consider a moment from the beginning of The Iliad. The very first event we are told about in the poem is that a priest of Apollo has come to Agamemnon and Menelaus, the leaders of the Greek, or Achaeans, army, to try to ransom his daughter back. She had been taken by the Achaeans in a raid and given to King Agamemnon. Her father has come to the Achaeans camp and “begged the whole Achaeans army but most of all the two supreme commanders.” (1, 17-18) He tells them that he prays that they will sack and plunder Troy and then go home safely, but please would they set his daughter free, and for that he offers gifts in ransom. He says: “Honor the God who strikes from worlds away – the son of Zeus, Apollo!” (1, 23-24)

The next line is: “And all ranks of Achaeans cried out their assent: “Respect the priest, accept the shining ransom!” (1, 25-26)
When I studied The Iliad, our professor pointed out that this sequence gives us the most elemental possible form of democracy. The Achean fighters stand around listening to the priest talk to the king, and they express their opinion by crying out. As it happens, the king ignores it. He angrily and contemptuously sends the priest away, and the ensuing plague (caused by an angry Apollo) sets in motion the action of the poem. In this world, without democratic accountability, the people were nevertheless right: the priest should have been respected and the ransom accepted. The poem is about what happens when a shortsighted king sees only his immediate interest and can’t see and is not curious about the effect his actions have on others.

In the Homeric world, the opinion of the people watching the action had no effect. We, on the other hand, who have inherited a beautifully wrought though imperiled system of democratic restraints, have seen at least two examples in living memory where the opinion of the people watching the action determined the action.

The first was the Nixon resignation, when the opinion of the majority of Americans was: “Lawbreaking by a president is wrong; Nixon must go!” By August 1974 Nixon’s approval rating was 24%, and 57% of Americans believed he should leave office. His abandonment by the public unmistakably guided the judgment of the Congress and ultimately of Nixon himself in deciding to resign rather than be impeached and tried in the Congress.

The second example was the Clinton impeachment, when the opinion of the majority of Americans was: “His failings are not impeachable; Clinton should stay!” Throughout the Lewinsky scandal, Clinton’s poll numbers were around 60%, the highest of his presidency. If his poll numbers had been near Nixon’s at their lowest, he would also have had to leave office. Both of these critical decisions in the last 50 years were ultimately decided by the people in a manner not dissimilar to the way the fighters sought to influence their leader in the poem.

Thus, watching the repulsive but fascinating spectacle of a sublimely ignorant president acting without knowledge nevertheless represents active civic participation. The Achaean fighters gathered around the priest and king. We gather around televisions and computers. Ultimately, what happens with T will be determined by us, whether we know it or not. —

---

1 I will follow Michelle Obama and others in not referring to the President by name. Like Antaeus, who gained strength every time he touched the ground, T seems to gain every time his name is mentioned, the business use of his name being but one example of this.

4 Loc cit.

5 Loc cit.

6 My thanks go to Professor James Redfield, the University of Chicago, for help in locating in 2017 the passage that he interpreted in 1973.

My grandmother uncertain of her deported family's fate wore black for four years when wearing black was not chic.
My closet
a swath of black stippled with olive green or navy blue favors irregular hemlines unusual details
architectural angles.
With each addition to the monochrome palette
my son asks
another black dress?
Slimming
easy to mix and match I say donning a formal black suit for the funeral.
It was yet another chilly day as I weaved and strode across the concourse at 34th Street-Penn Station. I was initially exasperated by the disorderly order—far too many roaming Romans—but then it occurred to me that the unpredictability of movement was humanizing. Given the increased regulation of public space, it was good to be able to drift, walk outside the line, and engage in watchful reverie. Slow down, I thought and drift.

As I approached the steps to the uptown 8th Avenue local platform, I heard a pan man on his tenor pan doing an electronic bass augmented rendition of Bob Marley’s Natural Mystic, and came to a halt.

I suddenly found myself confronted with an assault wrapped around an invitation. The assault came from an alliance between architecture and the scent of the passage where the pan man played. This particular passage way is a very efficient conduit for the effluent-tinged air emanating from the bowels of the subway and other odious precincts. Wherever you are on the 8th Avenue subway line in midtown, you are reminded that, probably right beneath your feet, there is a vast reservoir of shit, probably unprocessed, marinating, and a rankling reminder of our organic and expulsive nature. The air was also cold and accompanied by trash, making for a space that one traversed as quickly as possible.

And yet I had stopped. In addition to fetid air, the passage was a sublime incubator of sound, an acoustically friendly performance space. It was often used by talented musicians, usually older Black men, who were in that space but not of it. I often accepted the invitation to listen, as I enjoyed the artistry even as it seemed to desensitize me to the nostril wrinkling odors and the dusty chill.

The pan man was tall, tattooed, and wearing a tee shirt struggling to contain his muscles. His smile was generous and his sweat-flavored motion was one with the music. As an adolescent in Guyana I had often lingered, watching the rhythm of the players and listening to the music being coaxed from the steel drums. In those late sixties days, the genre was at the tail end of seeking European validation for the steel pan as an ‘authentic’ instrument capable of playing ‘serious’—read classical-music. Given that shallow aspiration—which reflected the colonizing aspect of the social unconscious—the body movements of the players were stilted. This was a reflection of a conscious willfulness to discipline another aspect of the cultural unconscious, the Afrocentric urge to move with the melody.

And then the Black Power hurricane swept through the Caribbean, Toots and the Maytals, Nina Simone, Burning Spear, James Brown, and Bob Marley among others, sang a different tune, danced to different rhythms, celebrated remembering, and re-signifying. They reminded us, in Marley’s timeless lyrics, “If you know what life is worth, you will look for yours on earth. Now you see the light stand up for your rights.”

The body rhythms of the pan men and increasingly women shifted to the melding of body and instrument, each somehow playing off the other.

Click here to play the music

The pan man performed Bob Marley’s, Natural Mystic.

Click here to play the music
Guidance: I humbly ask that you not listen to this tune on a cell phone, as you will not hear the bass. That would be akin to watching a color movie while wearing sunshades. An Ipad is ok... I guess... if you have decent ear phones. Try to listen while standing and moving with the bass. Yes we know ‘white’ folks can't dance but what is asked of you is far more elemental. Should you trust yourself, your body will synchronize quite pleasingly with the Africa that resides in all of us. Yes, I know the science is suspect but you get the idea. Forget about mindfulness; just trust the Jung within you.

With this tune the bass is fundamental to the melancholic and yet insistent flavor of the lyrics. It is a tune that arrests, humbles, and if you emerge from the shadow of reflection, offers hope. As a soloist, attuned to the augmented bass, the pan man swayed, hunkered, and flowed.

I watched and was not alone. Down the incline was a white middle-aged man, unremarkable in dress, and public face. His bag was at his feet, and at first glance I wondered if he belonged to the legion of the near homeless. Not quite respectable, on the verge of bedraggled. His forehead was against the cold dirty tile; perfectly still, as if in prayer. I realized he was in communion with the throbbing and hypnotic bass. In this rendition there were no lyrics, so the mind being forever restless would drift and the associations would cascade.

Yet I felt a bit uneasy as the pan man seemed to be enjoying himself, not a state that is usually invoked by this particular tune. He was not being disrespectful, but I thought he was close to the border. Who was his audience? Where had his mind taken him? Was this one of those Trinidadians, who could turn a funeral into a party? How did a dirge, with its command to sway become infected with joyous soca moves? He was not outside of himself. He sought to entertain me but also to derive his own pleasures, somewhat at a remove from the social. We shared and yet we were also separate. We were together in our own separateness and he felt quite comfortable to take his pleasure in ways that both pleased and discomfited me.

I had to accept that I am never truly sovereign or completely disengaged. The pan man's boundary flirtations challenged my own notions of 'authentic' reggae, linked to the heady ideological commitments of my youth. He was reminding me that we are not psychic islands; at best archipelagos, connected, with in-between spaces, and always in motion, however imperceptible. No matter how much I resisted I was subject to his interpretation; his exploitation of that fecund in-between space. A precarious space in which to create, connect and sometimes revel. Within that space one must be mindful of a form of tradition that insists on sameness, and also of a market that, faster than a click on amazon.com, commodifies difference. I am still uneasy about the pan man, given his aesthetic audacity, but that sits alongside a pleasure with what he shared.

At the end of the piece the white man bent, picked up his weary bag and gave the pan man a smile that verged on the beatific. I, still a tad ambivalent, gave a stiffy wave, and an offering. I smiled—to myself,—after all this is still New York— at the sound of the bass still playing in my mind, and went train waiting. —

C. Jama Adams, PhD.
Associate Professor of Psychology in the Department of Africana Studies at the John Jay College of Criminal Justice-CUNY.
Email: cadams@jjay.cuny.edu
In the inaugural issue of ROOM, my dear friend and colleague Elizabeth Evert published a piece that I found somewhat disturbing. Elizabeth brought thoughtful, critical attention to the historically negative and dismissive attitude psychoanalysis has held towards religion. Her plea for a more radical commitment to understanding and inclusion was heartfelt, and she is to be applauded for having raised these concerns at a time when challenges to such a view are to be expected. My response here does not concern Elizabeth directly but rather the direction that our current critical conversation appears to be taking as indicated by the appearance of her piece. The question I find myself preoccupied with is whether psychoanalysis is truly reducible to the project for a universal democratic understanding. Perhaps we are at a historical moment when an idealized version of the power of understanding needs to be criticized quite intensively, and perhaps psychoanalysis is in a position to perform that critique rather than submit to it.

Elizabeth’s essay was organized around two quotes from Freud’s Civilization and Its Discontents. The first articulates Freud’s standard Enlightenment condemnation of religious belief as a form of superstitious delusion, while the second demonstrates that even in critiquing a religious perspective Freud could not at times avoid appropriating its vocabulary. The suggestion was that Freud’s views, deriving as they did from the European climate of the 1920’s and 30’s, do not necessarily reflect what analysts might have to say about the location and power of the American religious project at the beginning of the 21st century. There is a good deal of truth in this, and perhaps an account of the peculiar rise and fall of psychoanalysis in the context of 20th century American consumer culture might be situated against the background of a relatively young cultural tradition deeply informed by the transcendentalism of Emerson and Thoreau.

However, halfway through the essay a parallel is drawn between psychoanalysis and Christianity as coincident efforts at “recognizing the value of each soul.” This struck me as a rather Christian understanding of psychoanalysis itself, one that demonstrates not a point of convergence between analysis and religion but a reading of clinical practice already determined by religious morality from the outset. There followed a further parallel drawn between psychoanalysis and Evangelical Christianity, leading to the author’s admission of her surprise that Evangelicals would largely support Trump’s presidential candidacy, and finally an appreciation of how “believ[ing] deeply in human rights” could authorize a “lifelong priority” to thinking “abortion as genocide.” I would argue that those who consider Planned Parenthood an agent of “genocide” should appear as offensive as those who would deny that the Holocaust actually happened, despite whatever endearing humanist qualities they might otherwise possess. If we are uncomfortable calling these “delusions,” perhaps we might employ the more palatable contemporary euphemism “alternative facts.” I am not sure we secure a victory for democracy in doing so. I am also not sure why we are so quick to demonize Muslim fundamentalism as “radical Islam,” while we are just as quick to naturalize Christian fundamentalism as “Evangelical Christianity,” or Jewish fundamentalism as “orthodox Judaism.” (Actually, I have a fairly good idea as to why we do this, but that is beside the point.)

The most cursory reading of Civilization and Its Discontents is enough to indicate that, for Freud, psychoanalysis is not a liberal discourse. Perhaps we might find in this a reason to revisit Freud’s perspective on contemporary politics, rather than yet another excuse for declaring Freud “dead.” In conjunction with the two quotes Elizabeth cited from Freud’s text, I found myself thinking of two others. In Chapter Four, Freud offers two objections to the notion of a universal love:

1. A love that does not discriminate seems to me to forfeit a part of its own value, by doing an injustice to its object; and secondly, not all men are worthy of love.

If we see in these points an expression of Freud’s rationalist arrogance, it is worth noting that these were sentiments offered by Aristotle in his Nicomachean Ethics. No doubt they are not Christian sentiments, but they are not specific to Freud, and they belong to the foundational attitude of democracy. Love, thought, and the pursuit of justice are gestures of discrimination—they concern what is singular, not what is universal. For Aristotle, indeed for the Athenians from whom our understanding of the democratic project originally derives, this is an attitude upon which democracy must be based. While it in no way lends itself to legitimizing the suicidal nightmare of Trumpism, democracy at its pre-Christian origins was not the democracy of the neoliberal order expressed today by the marketplace of global consumerism.

The second quote from Civilization and Its Discontents that occurred to me —this one much darker, and relegated to a footnote in the text— reads:

> Another difficulty arises from the circumstance that there is so often associated with the erotic relationship, over and above its own sadistic components, a quota of plain inclination to aggression. The love-object will not always view these complications with the degree of understanding and tolerance shown by the peasant woman who complained that her husband did not love her any more, since he had not beaten her for a week.

Here Freud distinguishes himself from the tendency towards fetishizing understanding and tolerance that psychoanalysis today seems to be embarking on, and that is not in keeping with the original orientation of our discipline. At what point do understanding and tolerance begin to facilitate masochistic self-sacrifice? At what point do they transition loudly into active struggle, and at what point do they transition quietly into passive compliance? Understanding should not be confused with tolerance, nor should tolerance be confused with acceptance. Fundamentalism is not the perversion of established religions;

"While it in no way lends itself to legitimizing the suicidal nightmare of Trumpism, democracy at its pre-Christian origins was not the democracy of the neoliberal order expressed today by the marketplace of global consumerism."
it is that through which religions become powerful in the first place by silently cultivating such perversions within themselves. It is by grasping this that psychoanalysis defies its critics and becomes something other than a religion, something closer to a science.

And here, though I can’t help but feel self-conscious in the privilege underwriting my appeal, I’m reminded of a speech by Dr. King. Not the famous “I Have a Dream” speech—which market democracy has been eager to embrace, because it does not challenge the hegemony of the marketplace or the fundamentalist morality that drives market relations today—but the (symptomatically) less famous yet to me more inspiring statement on “Maladjustment” from 1963:

Modern psychology has a word: “maladjusted.” Certainly, we all want to avoid the maladjusted life. In order to have real adjustment within our personalities, we all want the well-adjusted life in order to avoid neurosis, schizophrenic personalities. But I say to you, my friends... there are certain things in our nation and in the world to which I am proud to be maladjusted, and to which I hope all men of good-will will be maladjusted until the good societies realize. I say very honestly that I never intend to become adjusted to segregation and discrimination. I never intend to become adjusted to religious bigotry. I never intend to adjust myself to economic conditions that will take necessities from the many to give luxuries to the few. I never intend to adjust myself to the madness of militarism, to the self-defeating effects of physical violence. (emphasis added)

Notice that King does not say simply “bigotry,” but specifically “religious bigotry.” Also notice that he condemns specifically “physical violence”—which he will identify with the escalating nuclear arms race—while he otherwise advocates passionately for a certain critical violence, affirming that it is just to identify and to fight enemies of justice, because justice is not universal, it is local, and different, and fragile as a result. He goes on to propose the establishment of “a new organization in our world: the International Association for the Advancement of Creative Maladjustment—men and women who will be as maladjusted as the prophet Amos.”

Like Freud, King appeals to the terms of religion as a way of countering its intrinsically perverse tendencies, while grasping, perhaps again like Freud, that this is not a negative gesture of self-contradiction but a positive gesture of radical affirmation, even though it generates exclusion. I believe that what King understood here was that understanding must understand its own limits, and that it is at these limits and in the agonistic struggles they produce that we enter into the space of a genuinely democratic politics. Perhaps psychoanalysis today might redirect its tendency to idealize understanding towards an appreciation of the complex defiance of creative maladjustment. Perhaps there are perspectives that we should not tolerate, and not because of any failure in our capacity to understand, but because they are all too immediately understandable and recognizable in their destructiveness. —
DEATH

Low fluttering arc of twittering song birds. Hawk glides above: darts; done.

Arlene Kramer Richards
In the epigraph above, Jimi Hendrix’s poetic alter-ego expresses skepticism in regard to being seen and heard. Does he pose a question: “Can you see me?”; a demand: “Can you see me!?”; or perhaps a plea: “Can you see me…please”?

It occurs to me that these three interpretations of “can you see me” share the following common feature: the idea of a field.
of interaction (psychoanalytic matrix) between two subjects or souls (analyst and analysand) where the relationship between them has become occluded, insecure, or anxiety provoking and that is in need of further psychic interpenetration or clarification. Whether “can you see me” is a question, a demand or a plea, there is an interruption between the two people and a corresponding reaction that brings to light that which separates them.

There are many things that can interrupt a relationship and separate two people: a highly idiosyncratic or idiomatic turn of phrase, or a linguistic intonation; a whole language itself; gender identity; a way of interpreting, or looking at, a specific event in the world; a dressing style; a historical, cultural or personal past; the meaning of a favorite song or dance or bodily gesture; the color or shade of a body and the socio-political history of the construction of the meaning of such color or shade of the body (call it race); a social class and its history of struggles or oppression or of being oppressive; an unbalance of power; a trauma; a ritual; a rite of passage; a religious belief; a different idea of what it means to heal or grow.

But when there is in addition, a demand, a plea or a question as a symptom of an interruption in regard to being seen, these different psychic attitudes acquire a much deeper texture: the interruption at play is the expression of a more radical anxiety as to whether one’s very being is being seen; say, the being of the analysand or the being of the analyst. The see in “can you see me” could more generally mean an insecurity over whether our very being is being acknowledged by the Other. The insecurity emerges as a question, a plea, or a demand, towards the Other.

In this case, eyes are being understood in their power to not just see external things but also to acknowledge what is different in the Other. Following Stanley Cavell, such power is literal, not metaphorical; it is part of our lives as embodied beings or souls. I am not talking about eyes and the power to see as a metaphor or symbol of moral insight. Rather, I am talking about the multiple, ordinary, literal, embodied use of eyes to express feeling, to weep, to express awe or curiosity or love or attention or empathy, to recognize and to react to Otherness: an-Other’s separate existence, an-Other’s Being as being human.

The philosopher Stanley Cavell, following Wittgenstein, talks about soul-blindness. He claims that if it makes sense to talk about our capacity to see human beings as human beings, then it is possible to imagine that a human being may lack the capacity to see a being as a human being and not simply as a biological one. Think about slave-owners who did not see (did not have the capacity to see... but: why?) black Africans as humans. Think about the Spanish Conquerors who did not see (did not have the capacity to see...but: why?) so-called New World Indians as humans, as having a soul, a skeptical “problem” that became a famous philosophical discussion in 16th Century Spain (between the Catholic priests Sepúlveda and De Las Casas, in its more iconic expression). Think about the unspeakable horror of the Holocaust. Think about an innocent black man who is choked to death by a white policeman in Staten Island who does not hear, or does not want to hear, the innocent black man yelling “I can’t breathe! I can’t breathe!”! Think about Venezelans being violently repressed and killed by the State Apparatus just for thinking differently, otherwise. Or simply think about day-to-day, systematic racism, sexism, homophobia, transphobia, xenophobia… ferociously intensifying with a vengeance in these ominous times of Trump.

When eyes are used to perceive an external thing in isolation of their capacity to weep, the power of seeing is used as means to becoming inexpressive, unresponsive (or only cruelly responsive), and therefore hidden, to the Other. Better explained: the literal, embodied, power of the eyes to acknowledge Otherness, is inseparable from our capacity to empathically and emotionally respond to such Otherness in its own different terms (of race, gender identity, culture, sexuality, etc.) from the perspective of the Otherness that we also are.

Here is the question. How is it possible to miss what is literally unhidden and present within the analytic space? And such question implies a second question: how can one fail to recognize the Other unless she or he has become “literally invisible”, as Cavell says provocatively?

This is how: by hiding the Other through hiding Oneself. When we invisibilize the Other’s humanity we make a part of our own soul inaccessible to ourselves, actively suppressing it, creating a fantasy of self-privacy and of being unknowable to the Other. When the Other calls out for a response, CAN YOU SEE ME, only by actually responding, in doing or revealing something about my-self, therefore acknowledging the state or the history of my relation to him or her, do I acknowledge the Other. The question, demand or plea, even if unheeded, puts me in a position of responsibility to respond. Call this the ethics, or part of the ethics, of psychoanalysis. If the Other expresses her or his anxiety in regard to my not acknowledging their Otherness or Difference, this will have to do with my unwillingness (even if unconscious) to reveal myself as a fellow sentient soul inhabiting a potentially shared world.

A word of clarification seems in place here. Revelation here does not necessarily mean the kind of literal self-revelation implied in interpersonal psychoanalysis; but it does necessarily imply the capacity to use our eyes (our embodied beings) to be emotionally responsive and sensitive, or at least curious, towards such Otherness (through an ongoing investigation of our own countertransference as analysts, for example), and to find the words to express the potentiality of bridging the gap between I and Other, letting ourselves be transformed by such encounter, and also showing that, when we’ve reached the limits inherent to being a separate embodied existence, we are not withholding our attempt to try to reach out across the boundary that separates us.

In connection to the interruptions triggered by Otherness or Difference, psychoanalysis can be thought as what I would like to call a “discourse and practice on radical Otherness”. I will only briefly discuss three things which, in my mind, this entails:

-Psychoanalytic discourse and practice are, and were since their inception, a deviation from the norm, hence An-Other discourse and practice, a discourse and practice on that Other that is the Unconscious: think about psychoanalysis being thought in Europe as the “Jewish Science” (the Jew, that radical and “monstrous” and hence persecuted Other within, or at core of, the Self-Sameness of “normal” Christian Europe: the Jew as an emblem of the Unconscious). Psychoanalytic discourse and practice can be thought of as the scene of radical Otherness within the entrails of the normal or familiar -call it mainstream “consciousness” (but isn’t consciousness always mainstream?) In this sense, a “mainstream psychoanalysis” makes no sense, it is a contradiction in terms. Psychoanalysis, by its very nature and history, is on the side of those who have been excluded, persecuted, invisibilized, marginalized, the “ab-normal”, the “deviants”, the “monstrous”, the “unlovable”, the disenfranchised. Psychoanalysis, as discourse and practice on radical Otherness, is on the side of these silenced Other histories and works on inheriting them and making them visible.

-Psychoanalysis, as a discourse and practice on radical Otherness, questions the contemporary use of the term “diversity”. For psychoanalysis, such a concept is unfortunate in that it implies the idea of a Self-Sameness (a One) against which Difference is ontologically and epistemologically measured -and merely tolerated, ethically speaking; that is: the idea of a mainstream Us vs. Them (even if Diverse). That is why, in talking about psychoanalysis, and from a psychoanalytic perspective, it is preferable to talk about Difference or Otherness as an irreducible reality where there is not, or should not be, a Self-Same standard that is originary. Psychoanalysis is, first and foremost, since its beginning, a discourse and practice on Difference or Otherness as originary, and as speaking, and starting, from such Difference or Otherness (of the Unconscious) that always interrupts or problematizes Self-Sameness (call this Consciousness or Ideology or the Status Quo). For psychoanalysis, Self-Sameness is always a derivative and defensive formation against Difference (even under the guise of diversity and tolerance).

-Within psychoanalysis lies the question of soul-blindness. For this reason, I always keep in mind that there are no normal or ab-normal people for psychoanalysis, only people we do not acknowledge or recognize enough; including ourselves as analysts, because when we shut the Other out, we have also shut out a part of ourselves.

Psychoanalysis has to do with this difficult idea of “enoughness” and with what is enough or not enough in regard to the Other in each singular, different case. Each case can never, for psychoanalysis, be only considered a corroborating example of a previous psychoanalytic theory or category. Psychoanalysis has to think the difficult thought of a case that, in a sense, always inaugurates a new category or theory that therefore is, paradoxically, an example of itself: absolute singularity. This is another way of thinking about the ethics of psychoanalysis but also its specific kind of thinking. —

Email: carlosepadron@gmail.com

1 I am indebted to Eva Aristís for finding in Hendrix’s song “Can You See Me?” a connection with Difference within the psychoanalytic clinical encounter.

2 I think here of Winnicott’s constant and highly influential use of the idea of a “good enough mother” or a “good enough environment”, for example. It seems to me that this implied concept of “enoughness” (if it is a concept, and I think it is not, which, far from diminishing its semantic power, enhances it has not been sufficiently explored and understood both in itself and in connection to the thinking and ethics of psychoanalysis.
Bare trees line mountains
Under layers of blue clouds
The earth is quiet
One gong at a shrine
Echoing the past today
Calming the future
Timeless moments stay
Memories swiftly reshape
An experience
A TOAST

These remarks were given by Dr. Sheldon Bach at a publisher's celebration for his new book, Chimeras and Other Writings on November 20, 2017, twelve days after the election of Donald Trump.

This book was written over a period of many years. I think the earliest paper dates from 1972, and in that almost half a century so many things have changed in our world that we indeed seem to be living in another time and place. Just a few days ago I watched an old Hollywood film from 1957, An Affair to Remember, with Cary Grant and Deborah Kerr who meet on an ocean liner and fall in love although they are each engaged to someone else. They promise to meet in six months at the top of the Empire State building, but as she hurries to the rendezvous she is struck by a car and crippled, but she will never let him know why it is that she hadn’t shown up for their meeting. This tale of love, trust, fidelity and an eventual happy ending is accompanied by a chorus of smiling children conducted by the heroine in a wheel chair, who is being cared for by a trusted Catholic priest and a loving doctor who is constantly taking her pulse and refuses to be paid, and the lyrically swelling sound track at the happy end brought tears to my eyes.

How different from this contemporary vision by our late lamented Leonard Cohen:

Everybody knows that the dice are loaded
Everybody rolls with their fingers crossed Everybody knows that the war is over
Everybody knows the good guys lost
Everybody knows the fight was fixed
The poor stay poor, the rich get rich
That’s how it goes
Everybody knows
Everybody knows that the boat is leaking
Everybody knows that the captain lied
Everybody got this broken feeling
Like their father or their dog just died
That’s how it goes
Everybody knows
So everybody knows that the White House will soon be inhabited by scoundrels, that if you repeat a lie often enough people will begin to believe you and that you can fool a lot of the people a great deal of the time. Not that this hasn’t always existed, but the temper of the times has again become more frightening, and evil seems to feel less need to disguise itself in sheep’s clothing.

So what do we have to celebrate?

We can celebrate good people, of whom there are still plenty, including many who voted Republican. We can celebrate good food, good wine to drink, and good company. And, appropriately, at a publisher’s party, we can celebrate human creativity whether in the arts or in science, business, government, entrepreneurship or simply in some acts of loving kindness between people or even between one mother and one child.

What we have witnessed in the last few weeks is the wholesale destruction of meaning through lies, evasions and barbaric behavior. But most of us here in this room are lucky enough to be doing work whose very essence is the creation of meaning, and if we do that devotedly and speak up for the truth, each in our own way, then we are helping to redress the balance between life and death, which is always so precarious. I believe that if each one of us, every day, continues to replenish our store of meaning to replace the meaning that is being destroyed, then the world will be saved.

So I propose a toast to life, here and now. —
A growing group of IPTAR members and psychology interns and externs have been involved in a pilot program with the International Rescue Committee (IRC) to provide psychological counseling to refugees being resettled in New York through the IRC.

If you are interested in knowing more about our work in the community

PLEASE CONTACT
Gail Bragg
gailbragg@verizon.net

We initially worked with individual adults, and continue to do so, often in partnership with translators for non-English speaking clients.

A few months into this pilot project, IRC requested that we participate in their Unaccompanied Minors program, children who have crossed the U.S. border without an adult. An IPTAR member has been providing weekly pro bono counseling to several of these traumatized children and their new families in NYC, in their native Spanish language. IRC would very much like to expand counseling services for this population.

We have also been asked to support students in the ‘Saturday Learning Series,’ IRC’s Education Department’s academic support program. Every Saturday during the school year, up to 50 young refugees (ages 4 – 20) receive one-to-one academic tutoring by a volunteer tutor. The program directors, concerned that their students had been made anxious by recent executive orders banning refugees from some Muslim countries, as well as other anti-immigrant rhetoric, asked us to provide counseling and emotional support. Several IPTAR members and candidates have been running short term groups and workshops with these young people. At the conclusion, it is possible that some students will be interested in individual counseling or continuing in a group.

The IRC is an international humanitarian agency. In NYC they help resettle newly arrived refugees, and provide services to promote self-reliance and integration. If you’ve been feeling that you would like to use the skills and experience that you have to “do something” to support this vulnerable and increasingly insecure community, working in these initiatives could be a wonderful opportunity.
PLEASE CONTACT
Judy Hanlon
judith.hanlon@gmail.com

If you are interested in learning more about our work with Sanctuary for Families and if you would like to participate as a pro-bono therapist to these patients.

Sanctuary provides crisis intervention, shelter, counseling, legal representation, and economic and job counseling to adults and children exposed to gender violence. Some clients find temporary housing in Sanctuary’s shelters while others receive services while living outside. Many of the clients are immigrants.

We have placed one extern at one of Sanctuary’s five shelters, and we plan to have another extern working there next year. In addition, we are also receiving referrals from them to the ICC for pro bono therapy. They are able to provide short-term mental health treatment to their clients, but they are unable to provide longer term therapy, and this is one place where our therapists can be of help. Finally, Sanctuary’s Anti-Trafficking Initiative has referred patients to us. Korean-speaking candidates at IPTAR have been particularly important in this, in that Sanctuary has been helping a substantial number of Korean trafficked women.
On March 16, 2017, the Citizen Forum created an opportunity for participants to both discuss and experience phenomena generated by the current political climate. The Forum, structured to integrate both small and large group discussion, positioned itself as inhabiting a space in the interface between the political and the psychoanalytic. We hoped that as the discussion proceeded, group members would have an opportunity to experience and verbalize themes that had been previously unconscious and that these experiences would introduce themselves into the group either through some form of micro-enactment or as felt experience. The thought was that by virtue of engaging in this experience, internal confusion might be made available for conscious thought with the possibility that participants would leave the meeting with a greater sense of clarity and coherence.

In the introductory segment each of the 19 participants, representing a wide range of ages and diverse cultural and professional backgrounds, including members of The LJ Gould Center Steering Committee, spoke briefly about their thoughts and feelings related to the current political situation. This was followed by small group discussions that identified themes to be explored in greater depth in the final segment.

One theme that emerged was the idea of who is “big” and who is “small” in the current climate. Many members of the Forum became aware, as the discussion developed, that they identified themselves with the progressive/liberal elite; what became more conscious for many was their identification with the ruling class. What was difficult to process was the extent to which it feels like the customary power structure seems up-ended, leaving many of us suddenly feeling powerless and persecuted. Forms of identity supporting structures (such as NPR, NEA, NIH, EPA) are being attacked and dismantled. We can now identify with the disempowered “other” – we are the disempowered other in Trump’s new world. And as such, do we still have a capacity for empathy with the other, or are we too busy protecting ourselves and fighting for survival. Is empathy a privilege of the powerful?

This led to a member’s reverie about an American landscape icon, familiar to us all, and a hopeful belief in the power of American democracy to endure. In an interesting movement, another member associated to the musical Annie, and in particular, the song “Tomorrow” where optimism and faith in the future were belied by the presence of the greedy, exploitative and abusive Daddy “WarBucks”.

As the discussion continued to deepen, a member of the group who comes from another country quoted sentiments from back home that “The US has historically talked like Hillary, but behaved like Trump”. Now there is more honesty – the US is talking like Trump and behaving like Trump. The true nature of the US is emerging, there is less hypocrisy. Now the true level of rapacious and voracious greed are obvious, without disguise. Suddenly, a faction of the group was now identified with the aggressor. Members voiced a sense of shame, and expressed the narcissistic injury of facing ourselves as a people being led by a leader like Trump.

What was fascinating to experience was the transformation in the group as it moved through the experience of feeling that we now are a disempowered “othered” group, who cannot protect itself from persecution, or indeed, annihilation, and later coming to an identification with the need to disrupt and change old structures. There was a sense in ending that we too need to tear down the old oppressive structures. –
Contributors to ROOM 5.17

Hattie Myers
Editor in Chief
Gila Ashtor
Managing Editor
Sonal Soni
Production Editor
Mafe Izaguirre
Graphic Designer

Editorial Staff
Elizabeth C. Evert
Janet Fisher
Richard Grose
Karen Bernstein*
Eugene Mohlen*

C. Jama Adams is Associate Professor in the Department of Africana Studies at John Jay College of Criminal Justice CUNY. He is currently working on a book about the psychological adjustment strategies of African workers in China.

Sheldon Bach is a Training and Supervising Analyst and on faculty at IPTAR. He has written five books on psychoanalysis, most recently “Chimeras and Other Visions” (IP Books, 2016).

Violette Bule uses photographic and mixed media projects to highlight complex social problems as a means for social change. She has exhibited in contemporary art museums and fairs in Tokyo, Caracas, Paris, London, Hong Kong, Miami, NYC, and Basel. In 2014 she was awarded the Guggenheim Foundation grant. Bule won first place in the 18th edition of Jóvenes Con Fía 2015, Caracas, Venezuela.

Ani Bula is a research Analyst and on faculty at the Contemporary Freudian Society and the Graduate Art Therapy Program of New York University, as well as the Kirt Institute; a postgraduate program focused on the role of the creative arts therapies to treat traumatized populations.

Richard Grose is an advanced candidate at IPTAR. He has private practice of psychotherapy and psychoanalysis in New York City and was editor of the Round Robin (2013-2017).

Susan Katz is a photographer, writer, and psychotherapist in private practice in NYC, NY.

Joan V. Liebmann is a psychiatrist and psychoanalyst in private practice in Washington, DC and a clinical faculty member at the George Washington University School of Medicine.

Carlos Padrón is a licensed psychoanalyst and an advanced candidate at IPTAR’s adult psychoanalytic program. He has written on the intersections between philosophy, psychoanalysis, and literature. He hails from Venezuela.

Arlene Richards is a training and supervising analyst at IPTAR and poet. Her most recent book is Myths of Mighty Women. (Karnac 2015).

Jared Russell is a psychoanalyst and on faculty at IPTAR. His most recent book is Nietzsche and the Clinic (Karnac 2016).

Audrey Siegel is an analyst emeritus at IPTAR, a photographer, and was the first co-director of IPTAR’s Clinical Center from 1992-2000.

Rona Silverton is a psychoanalyst, a member of IPTAR, and a watercolor artist.

Mafe Izaguirre is a Venezuelan visual artist interested in poetic computation and robotics. Her professional studies include visual language fundamentals, semiotics, art, photography, digital media, and media ecosystems. After dedicating 12 years of her life to teaching design and visual communication in the Diseño School of Visual Communication in Caracas, Mafe has joined us in New York (thanks to an artist’s visa) where she is creating an emotional robot based on concepts in Nietzsche and Wittgenstein.

Her past research includes a limited print edition of visual schemas of ‘mind concepts’ from Kant, Hegel, Benjamin, Adorno, Levinas, Merleau-Ponty, Elaine Scarry and Sianne Ngai. The contributors to ROOM have been honored to work with her and IPTAR is grateful for her generous contribution to our analytic community.

Website: www.mafeizaguirre.com
Tumblr: http://eiproject.tumblr.com/
Instagram: @eiproject
Profile: https://www.linkedin.com/in/mafelandia
Email: mafelandia@gmail.com

ROOM ISSUE 5.17
NEW YORK
USA

©2017 IPTAR
Institute for Psychoanalytic Training and Research, Inc.
A NYS Nonprofit Corporation
1651 3rd Ave — Suite 205
New York, NY 10128
Phone: +1 (212) 427-7070
http://iptar.org/